One of the reviewers for the recent book Elusive Consumption Eric J. Arnold summed up the two approaches of market research with his nice little illustration. He goes on to say many traditional academic market researchers are like those who study the fish. Contributors to this volume [Elusive Consumption] are like those who opt to study the water. One can argue about which approach leads to catching more fish. My bet lies with those who explore the environment. For him, it is evident that the only way one can come close to evaluating the interaction between consumers and market forces is by focusing on the environment the consumer finds himself in. That is exactly what the authors of the book Elusive Consumption found out after extended research....
