Not illustrated. 1868 Excerpt: .the hyenas, the parrots, the tigers, the lion, and all these wild beasts of foreign lands have been more familiar to me from infancy than if I had lived in the torrid zone. Nor was he satisfied with taking us to see them. He told us about them. He bought books for us respecting them. Goldsmith's natural history, with its pictures and anecdotes, is a book for boys that I wonder not to see reproduced in these days. We never tired of it I beg some wise publisher to prepare an edition of it for a reading book in schools. If I mistake not, unless he should leave out the best part, it would have a larger sale, and do more good, than one half of the books now used in our schools. The picture-dealer was a pious man, too. I could never quite understand what he and father meant, but they talked very much about Christian experience; and about conversions, and revivals, and the work of the Lord generally. And then we all kneeled down, and the good old man prayed, and we went to bed happy and contented. He used to pray for us individually; so that we thought we must be worth something in his sight, and probably in God's sight, too. And this thought made us sober, though happy. Generally, the children were not noticed at all in prayers, or, if they were, were generalized into one lot, like the...
