In considering these matters I propose to lay especial stress on a feature which serves to differentiate anthropology from other sciences, viz., the special urgency of its needs due to the character of its material. The importance of this distinction is so great that it may be dwelt upon for a moment. In the sciences dealing with inorganic matter and with living creatures other than man, the phenomena which form their subject-matter are stable. The decision of a chemist whether he will use the present moment to attempt the synthesis of a substance is not influenced by the probability, much less the certainty, that in a few years the materials for the synthesis will have wholly disappeared. It is only in certain departments of systematic biology that there is any serious loss and change of the material with which science deals. With this exception the evidence now present will be equally available a hundred or a thousand years hence. This factor of urgency, wholly or almost without importance in other branches of science, is one from which the anthropologist can never escape, and it is of such vital importance that I have no hesitation in using it as my chief guide in this report. The aim of anthropology is to teach us the history of mankind, of his physical structure, mind, social organization, language, morals,...
